New software offers easy recording and exports to iTunes

Snowtape is a new application for Internet radio enthusiasts. The software helps you keep track of, and find, your favorite Internet radio stations. The programs store stations in a database, which then can be used to find specific stations, genres, or bandwidth. The program also records radio streams. The software will also allow users to set start and end points in recordings, and can help identify possible commercials for editing.

After you get your selection finalized, the software then has a one-click export to iTunes. The software encodes music to AAC format and sends to iTunes. The software also works with iTunes stored radios stations. Users can drag and drop stations from iTunes and use them in Snowtape.

A trial version of Snowtape is available to download. The trail is fully functional for listening, and can record up to 60 minutes total before it prompting users to buy. The software sells for $29.
